First term English exam

Nearly every continent has its ruins, places where only stones tell the tale of fallen civilizations. Yet they all raise the same questions: How could something so great all but vanish? Why do civilizations collapse?

Civilizations are far more difficult to define, but still demand a number of requirements to thrive including a large, centralized population; a surplus of food, a centralized government, religious unity ... etc. Naturally, any harm to that large, centralized population can potentially lead to a civilization's collapse.

Such a blow might come in the form of genocidal warfare, epidemic disease or geological disorder. The Mayan civilization, for instance, faded from prominence after the 16th century Spanish invasion brought warfare, disease and a foreign culture intent on spreading its own rule. Environmental changes can also wipe out a civilization, especially if they impact the food supply. A 300-year drought decimated the Akkadian empire between 2200 B.C. and 2500 B.C.

The Roman economic crisis led to Rome's fall because of less conquest, which in turn meant fewer human resources to keep the wheels of industry and agriculture turning. The ancient Pueblo in North America pose yet another interesting model for civilization collapse. Pueblos practised agriculture and astronomy. They built elaborate cliff dwellings yet eventually abandoned them. Historians point to numerous factors in their decline, including warfare and cooler temperatures in addition to a divisive religious crisis that caused many of them to migrate south to follow Christianity.

From population to religion, a number of factors play into the subsistence of civilization. If enough of them fail, however, things inevitably fall apart.
